TRUE FRIENDSHIP.

That one alone I count my friend,
Who gently caresses when I faintly comment,
Who friendly counsels when I see me stray
From virtue's path in folly's tempting way,
Whom wrongs from friends I never know,
But from a heart that feels no wrong,
The gentle feelings of whose noble soul
No selfish views of interest control,
And who his love in constant presence,
Who never dejects the sacred cause he serves—
Whose mind alike bestows the tender care
When poverty my down, or wealth my share—
Who still stands by when enemies are true,
And anxious, strive to hold me up to shame—
Whom, sympathizing, holds my fainting hand,
When worn by sickness, languishing, in bed,
Who shares in all my joys, or happiness,
Preserves my welfare, grieved at my distress,
Tends a friend could cross my humble lot,
Were I exiled, neglected or forlorn,
His soothing words would grant me sweet relief,
Consoled my cares and smooth the bed of grief.

SHALL FREEDOM DROOP AND DIE?
Shall Freedom droop and die,
And we stand idle by,
When countless millions are in bondage,
Will ask the reason why?
If for her sake I die,
You bravely fight and die,
Be sure that God on his great host
Will mark the reason why.
But should we live,
Sated by the battle cry,
Then through all eternity
You'll hear the reason why.—C. G. LEVINE.

Is it all?

LUCIFEROUS MISTAKES.

In a picture of the "Sacrifice of Isaac," in a country church in Germany, Abraham is represented with a bloodstain in his hands, ready to shoot Isaac. In another, in Spain, Abraham is preparing to shoot Isaac with a pistol.

There is a painting at Windsor, England, in which the artist has introduced himself, and Sir Godfrey Kneller, in long periwigs, as spectators of Christ healing the sick.

Shakespeare places the scene of a shipwreck on the coast of Bohemia.

There is also a sort of anachronism of the hands in the case of a painter, of Toledo, who painted the story of the three wise men of the East coming to worship, and bringing presents to our Lord, on his birth at Bethlehem. He presents them as three Arabian or Indian kings, two of them white and one black; but, unhappily, when he drew the latter part of them kneeling—which, to be sure, was done after their faces, their legs being necessarily a little distorted—he made three black feet for the negro king; and the three white feet for two white kings; and the mistake was never discovered till a long time after the painting was put up in the church!

The monks of a certain monastery in Messina exhibited with great triumph a letter written on paper made of eggs by the Virgin Mary, with her own hand, several hundred years before paper of this description came into existence.

In an old book of sermons by a divine of the name of Milson, we are reminded that it is one among the many proofs of the wisdom and benevolence of Providence, that the world was not created in the midst of winter, when Adam and Eve could have found nothing to eat; but in the fairest time, when there was fruit on every tree and shrub to tempt the willing hand.

Another clever commentator of the same stamp praises Divine Goodness for always ordering the largest rivers flow by the most populous towns.

Recent, in his "History of the Turks," says that "they so confused chronology and history, as to assert that Job was a judge in the court of King Solomon, and Alexander the Great one of his generals."

Wieland, by no means a contemptible writer, was deceived into the belief that Plutarch wrote the "Life and Actions of Charles the Fifth," because, in some Latin editions of "Plutarch's Lives," a life of that monarch has been annexed.

Melville, in his account of John Knox, says "he was so active and vigorous a preacher, that he was like to die of the pulpit into black, and die of it." A French writer, in a translation of Robertson's "History of Scotland," where this passage occurs, thus literally renders it: "Soon hearing himself like the fire of his passions and hatred, he flung himself like a madman to leave his pulpit, and leaped into the midst of his auditors."

TO THE LADIES.—The celebrated DR. J. DIX, physician, invites all who are afflicted with any of the following diseases, to call at his residence, No. 21 Endicott Street, Boston, Mass., where they will find the most complete and successful treatment of all the diseases of the female sex, and of the most delicate and difficult cases.
